From the West

Past Master Harvey Webber is featured in a story in the October 23rd Hampton Union by Patrick Cronin about his repairing the town clock that was in the Odd Fellows Building in downtown Hampton which burned down.

The owner of Webber's Antiques has been working on repairing the large timepiece since 2005. Prior to that, the damaged clock parts had been collecting dust for more than a decade at the Town Hall after they were retrieved from the fire that destroyed the Lafayette Road building.

Webber, along with his father Robert, got involved in the project back in 2004, after selectmen threatened to sell the old parts, saying it would cost too much to repair the unique clock.

The father and son team offered to repair the clock at no cost to the town.

"People thought it was worth all this money and it wasn't," Webber said at the time. "The value is that it's a part of Hampton's history."

The clock was originally given to the town as a gift in 1897 from John T. Brown of Newburyport, Mass. Webber said the town made a promise when it accepted the clock to keep it in good working order.

Harvey Webber said the project took on an even more special meaning for him over the years after his father died in 2005.
